Owing to the education reform of incorporating language arts into the New Senior Secondary curriculum, using poems in the English classroom is unavoidable. Globally, poetry has received recognition of its values and strengths in language learning but it is still uncommon to find teachers in Hong Kong using poems in English lessons. This maybe due to both teachers' and students' misconceptions in poetry learning.

In order to investigate students' views on using poetry in the curriculum, this paper aims at studying their responses, preferences, understanding of poetry and creativity in writing poetry. In the study, three instruments, including a questionnaire, structured interviews and some students' work, are used to collect data. The findings show that students generally liked learning English through poems. They preferred to learn some easy, short and interesting poems. Although some poems with certain patterns are difficult for them, their work can show their understanding of the characteristics of the poems. Lastly, students also expressed that they liked to use their imagination, feelings and personal experiences in writing their poems. It is believed that using poetry in the classroom can facilitate students' learning and enhance language acquisition. It seems therefore that more research in exploring poetry learning in the English classroom is worth conducting. However, a narrow focus on STEM subjects at the expense of the humanities has led educators to deprioritize poetry and to overlook its interdisciplinary, multi-modal potential. The editors and contributors argue that poetry is not a luxury, but a way to stimulate linguistic experiences that are formally rich and cognitively challenging. To learn through poetry is not just to access information differently, but also to forge new and different connections that can serve as reflective tools for lifelong learning. This interdisciplinary book will be of value to teachers and students of poetry, as well as scholars interested in literacy across the disciplines.

This volume gathers contributions in the closely linked fields of English language assessment and language education. The contributors from China and Hong Kong represent a mixture of established and new scholars. Areas covered in the language education section range across major developments in the redefining of Hong Kong's secondary and tertiary curricula, as well as the huge field of China's vocational education curriculum. Regarding assessment,
